You can enable the "timing" option under the performance tab of the profiler. It should show you some results of what the takeup of time is. Once you have that information, you can focus in on those areas of your code and look at your algorithm to find out why it's taking so long. Profiling is the easiest way to do this. Cotton (Gossypium hirsutum L.) is the world's leading natural textile fiber. Cotton is used for a wide variety of products including textile fibers, oil, and processed foods. Approximately half of the world's cotton crop is grown in the United States. The 2007/2008 season saw a record 93.3 million bales of cotton harvested in the United States. The chemical composition and the length of the fibers in the cotton fiber are key parameters to the commercial value of cotton. Cotton fibers are classified based on their length. Typically, the longer or "slub" fibers contain more anthocyanin and linoleate than the shorter or "lint" fibers. The length of the cotton fibers is an important fiber characteristic for various textile products. The spinning process involves opening (opening step) and drawing (drawing step) the fibers in order to align them more uniformly in the direction of the spinning axis. Opening of cotton fibers is conventionally performed by using mechanical fiber opening devices, e.g., a comb. Opening and drawing steps are usually combined in a spinning machine or a carding machine. In the case of cotton, the opening and drawing steps are usually conducted separately in two or more carding machines. One of the key steps in the cotton manufacturing process is the separation of cotton fibers from the seeds and foreign materials, e.g., plant parts and stems, which adhere to 82157476af
